No. 107

Apr. 12, 2008

Since New Year's, I've been thinking about the year I graduated high school – more than I normally do. Standard-interval anniversaries can have that effect.

No, I don't intend to attend any class reunion. Of course, I'm presuming there is a class reunion. We weren't exactly known for our school spirit.

Mostly what we all had in common was enforced proximity, as in a minimum-security prison. That's not motivation enough to spend time and money traveling halfway across the continent just to confirm that some people I knew slightly 20 years ago are older, fatter, and balder – and that goes double for the men. From the yearbook, I now only recognize about a quarter of the 250 or so students in my graduating class. I interacted regularly with about half of that quarter. Possibly, I might not recognize anybody even with the name tags, if I did attend.

What about my friends? Most of them haven't stayed in touch, the bastards. Only two, plus my sister, among all the people who attended high school and college with me have maintained the necessary minimal contact over the years.

If all this seems boring, it's because I'm describing a constrained, static part of my life. My interactions with my family or with co-workers were more gratifying. But that static period did end.

In fact, on the last day of classes, one of my classmates – the world’s unlikeliest cheerleader – told me that I was the only one of our class who was beyond all the standard high school pettiness. It’s true. Mentally, I’d already left about six months earlier, which tempered my seething impatience.

In turn, that virtual relocation derived from knowing that high school society was too short-term and too small-time to bother with. Maybe if I’d spent more than two years there I’d have a stronger attachment to the place. Yeah, I can’t stop laughing at that notion, either.

Her praise indicated no one else had really thought about an end to high school – or life beyond it.

And my unique perspective derived from paying attention to the world at large – often through commercial, mainstream providers of news, arts and entertainment – a bigger, brighter, bolder world.

Thus, my fond retrospection is about the Zeitgeist then, replete with that peculiar twilight vibrancy the end of an era displays to the observant. Most of the personal stuff isn’t what deserves to be remembered from that time. This is what deserves to be remembered:
